have been written off as a “coincidence” by Merck researchers and government health officials.

It is important to stick to the instructions prescribed on the bottle label.

All of these items are prepared but not used during a medical procedure are discarded because they are considered “un-sterile” even if there has been no contact at all with the patient.